Organized by the Division of Youth Affairs and the Student Welfare Wing in collaboration with the Division of Residential Services, this event saw over 30 teams from various hostels showcase their creativity and diversity over the past two months.

Every bee
in a hive
has a job.
Here’s how they get them.

Individual Contribution

Each bee, following its own set of rules, contributes uniquely to the hive’s well-being. Every student has a unique role to play, contributing their individual strengths and perspectives to enrich the college community.

Decentralized Organization

Bees operate without a central leader; their roles are determined by a mix of genetics, hormones, and situational needs. Similarly, students in college often choose their paths based on personal interests, skills, and experiences rather than a centralized authority dictating their future.

Adaptive Roles

Bees' roles shift according to the hive's needs, demonstrating flexibility and adaptability. College students frequently adjust their majors and career plans based on changing interests, job market trends, and personal growth.

Innate Potential

Bees are born with potential that is influenced by genetics but realized through experience and necessity. Students come to college with inherent talents and aptitudes, which are honed and developed through education and experiences.

Collective Success

The hive’s success relies on the collective effort and cooperation of all bees. College communities thrive when students collaborate, share knowledge, and support each other, leading to individual and collective achievements.

Continuous Learning

Bees learn and adapt throughout their lives to meet the hive’s dynamic needs. College life is a continuous learning process where students evolve and adapt their skills and knowledge to prepare for future challenges.
